Q: How does communication differ for children with autism and apraxia?

A: Apraxia is a condition where you know exactly what you want to say, but the neural pathway from your brain to your mouth doesn't work right. Your mouth requires a lot of muscles—your tongue, your cheeks, opening and closing, controlling air—and people with apraxia have trouble controlling these different muscles. While it comes naturally to most people, it's a real challenge for them. With autism, communication can also be a challenge, especially since they don't generally make eye contact or copy others very well. That is because a lot of autistic people are leaders; they are not followers, so they aren't going to copy you.

Q: Right, the question was how does communication differ for children with autism and apraxia?

A: Ah, okay. So apraxia makes it extremely hard to physically talk. On the other hand, autistic kids, if they are not non-verbal, can generally talk, but they are not going to talk for no reason. They will speak up for things they need, things they want, if they are feeling sad, or to say "leave me alone," but they aren't really talking about philosophy or other deep topics.

are going to talk for no reason. They will speak up for things they need, things they want, if they are feeling sad, or to say "leave me alone," but they aren't really talking about philosophy or other deep topics.
